What License Photos and Studio Portraits Have In Common

Kent Crockett once wrote, "Most of us cringe when we have to show others our driver's license photograph. We look either washed out from too much light, or shadowy and suspicious from too little. Our eyes look either goofy and wide-eyed, or droopy and sleepy-eyed. Our hair is hopelessly out of place. And our smile? 'Good grief,' we say to ourselves, 'do I really smile like that?'"

Then there's the opposite extreme—the studio portrait. ... With the photographer's magic ... The right background highlights our colors. The most flattering angle emphasizes our strong points. The lighting softens our features. ... The air brush can blow away any wrinkles or imperfections.

As radically different as they are, the driver's license photo and the studio portrait have one thing in common: neither is realistic. But if we want to be authentic people who impact others, it's important that the portrait others see is real."

In the end, only God sees the "real" us. So it is important that we always strive to be authentic in all our relationships if we want to have a true impact and influence on everyone we come into contact with for the glory of the Kingdom of God.

I love you all,
Tim
